MSM is found in all living plant and animal tissues. A precursor to MSM is formed by ocean plankton, released into the atmosphere, where it interacts with ozone and sunlight, and returns to the earth as MSM in rainfall. MSM is then absorbed by plants and in our food, although no measurement of MSM content of foods have been done. It is easily destroyed by minimal processing, cooking. It is vital to optimal health, as MSM is involved in many enzymatic and biological processes in the body.
